is a powerfulQ: What's the preferred way to unit test asynchronous Ruby code? I'm using FactoryGirl and rspec to write functional tests. The tests check that records are removed from the database as expected. Now, there's some code that's asynchronously removed from the database, so I can't use `expect(...).to be_nil`. This code is the code that signs a person up and the code that signs them out, and they're executed outside of the context of the controller test. When it comes to testing this, what's the preferred way to do this? Can I use something like this?

def
  signup_test setup do create(:admin, :nickname => "John") create(:person, :id => 2, :admin => true) @person = FactoryGirl.create(:person, :active => false)
  end @person.signup(FactoryGirl.build(:admin))
  assert_difference
'ActiveRecord::Associations::CollectionProxy' do
  ActiveRecord::Base.transaction do user =
  User.last expect(user.id).to eq(2) user.update_
